ADAM'S first wife LILITH is mentioned in the ancient Oriental legends, in Talmud and in the medieval books of Cabala. According to these sources, she was not created from Adam's rib like Eve but from clay like he himself. Nevertheless Lilith was not recognised by Adam as his equal and left him after a quarrel heading for Babylon where pre-Adamians lived. She has no soul, and she is immortal. Lilith assumes different names, can change her appearance, and takes possession of men against their will. Once it's accomplished, she leaves her victims forever, marking them for either spiritual, or physical death. Whatever she does it is neither Good nor Evil. She is made of an altogether different matter.

The story consists of three interrelated short stories:

• 1664 (Europe. East. Mid-17th century)
• 1883 (Russian Empire. France. End of the 19th century)
• 1990 (Latvia. Riga. Palmira. Present)

Script, Director YEVGENY PASHKEVICH

Theophilius (43), art dealer from Riga leaves his wife Sophia (27) shortly before her childbirth, and with a painting of rare beauty sails to the famous collector Borgraph (65) with whom he has been corresponding and has sold paintings more than once. They have never met.

Theophilius had paid so much attention to the painting of Lilith that Sophia sometimes has had a feeling that the woman lived in their house. She has tried to ascribe her growing irritation to her pregnancy and yet felt relief when the painting was removed from the house.

Being the only passenger on the ship, Theophilius spends much of his time in the company of the Captain (45). The seafarer tells him about the incredible riches awaiting any pioneer in the Southern latitudes, and keeps assuring him that this voyage to the North is his last one... No matter what is happening on the ship, Theophilius scrupulously and jealously takes care of the precious painting wrapped in a few pieces of leather.

A storm brakes out. Pressing the bundle with the painting to his breast Theophilius, much to his amazement, discovers that he is not in the north Europe as he would have expected... but somewhere on the shores of the East?!

Theophilius is met at Borgraph’s castle by the Housekeeper Nida (40). She has an elegant grey dress and only a white lace collar gives her a touch of femininity in her otherwise almost nun-like appearance. The guest is struck by her semblance to Lilith in his painting.

The old Borgraph, on the contrary, is eager to show hospitality: he takes him round his properties, questions him about the habits of his country, about his family. Gradually the main topic of their discussions becomes the mystery of life and death, nature of things, Cabala. The feeling that he is on the threshold of a mystery more and more overtakes Theophilius. He becomes preoccupied with the question: Why does it take so much time for the host to examine and estimate the painting Theophilius has brought along.

Ivola (17), Borgraph’s Daughter, has no intention to hide her sincere interest and attachment to Theophilius. She possesses a unique combination of semi-childish openness with a sensible attitude towards the surrounding reality. During the meal Ivola with her typical childish straightforwardness asks Theophilius to stay longer. But he feels that he would loose his mind if he stayed under the same roof with Nyda (Lilith) and the painting. During the examination of the painting in the library Theophilius silently watches the old man who stares at the image of Lilith with enchanted eyes, mumbling about the horrifying Eden and the necessity of a further stay of the guest at the castle. The old man smokes opium and enters into a trance. Theophilius gets to know the Reality which so much oppressed his wife Sophia: Lilith-Nyda exists outside the canvas.

At night, Lilith as an embodiment of the evil spirit in the form of a male succubus arrives to Teophilius’s pregnant while in Riga and in the form of female Creator to Theophilius in the Borgraph castle. Sophia and Theophilius are sure that they lie... in the embraces of each other...
Feeling the affinity of his death, Father Marziale (65) already for several months is living in a rural area and has gathered around himself a poor congregation, thus giving up the hustle of a large city and the numerous duties he used to have while teaching philosophy at the leading Catholic seminaries. His dwindling life is sustained by the expectations of a positive response from the archbishop about the work of his life “On Creation of the World”. Some of the major assumptions of his fundamental research are as follows: existence of many inhabited worlds is recognised, God aspires to reconcile science and Belief, and there have been two creations of the world separated from each other by many centuries...

Ari Brilsky (22), a Russian citizen of Polish aristocratic descent, after returning from Paris hurries to his mentor Marziale. He implores him to save him, since he is on the brink of perishing...

In Paris, where he had lived for several years, he is engaged to a worthy and lovely girl. His friend Paul d’Ervi (22), a career diplomat, has just returned from Constantinople and agrees to become his best man at the wedding. After being asked about his own affairs, Paul replies that in Constantinople he had betrayed and led to despair a kind friend by taking away his woman. Soon afterwards she comes into the hall herself, and completely mesmerizes Brilsky. Her otherworldly appearance makes him feel both frightened and irresistably drawn to her. Paul is trying to introduce Brilsky, but Leila (30) insists they already know each other. When Brilsky’s upcoming wedding is mentioned, her golden eyes say: “NO!”.

Soon afterwards Paul’s manservant tells Brilsky that his master is out and asks if Brilsky is not inclined to see the lady of the house. Brilsky goes in. Leila’s face is betraying no human emotions: neither good, nor bad – only lasciviousness, both sensual and unearthly...

Leila moves in with Brilsky, and Brilsky’s engagement is broken. When Paul hears of Leila’s betrayal, he is maddened with grief and threatens to kill her. He receives the following answer from her: “Try, my friend, I would gladly die but unfortunately I can’t”.

One morning Leila tells Brilsky she would like to return to Persia. To Brilsky’s tears and accusations she only says: “I did not love you, my friend. But think of all the women that did not love you more than me who were unable to give you what I did. You must be grateful to me. Farewell”.

Puzzled by the jolly and almost euphoric mood of Father Marziale, and too exhausted to finish the account of his sad experience, the stunned Brilsky hears out the summary of the priest:

“Just now I received an answer from the eparchy. The supreme vicar writes that my book disappointed the bishop. His grace cannot approve of such undermining philosophising. But your adventure will prove that Lilith, Adam’s first wife, exists and that it is not my sheer fantasy!”.
Riga. Present day. Troubled, exotic dreams of a man: firewalls and facades of Art Nouveau buildings at night, traces of houses and people gone into oblivion forever. Pompeii of Time. Riga is falling into an abyss, accompanied by the quiet rustling of wind as it blows the sea sand over the city... something reminds of Atlantis.

The installation artist Franz (34) projects upon them his artistic fantasies and relives some episodes of his life.

The opening of his personal exhibition approaches.

He can turn up at artists’ café with cardboard scrolls, boxes, with a saw. After an hour he might be at a reception at the Mayor of Riga or delicately trying to wrangle from someone the body of a dead dog which he needs for his new installation or in the spur of the moment pay a nightly visit to his lover...

Franz is an artist. His life is as real and as eerie as his installations. He always ends up neither There, nor Then, nor being with whom he should.

On a winter’s night, on the outskirts of the city a fantastic event happens to Lola (18) following whom he finds himself in the barracks turned by Gypsies into their camp. It is there that Franz is to fully experience the charms of the lascivious young Gypsy girl who almost depraves him of his free will. His only solution is preoccupation with his own work – out of this mystical reality he composes an installation and the surrounding people submissively obey his fantasies...

Does Lilith retreat this time...?
The aesthetic and thematic aspects of the film are actualised on two levels.

The first level is obvious: the film consists of three love stories. It presents a variation on the theme of immortality of Lilith after whose embrace men are doomed to perish. Lilith is life; her departure signifies death, spiritual or physical for the happy-unhappy lover.

The second level has different tasks. The myth about Lilith is one of the most ancient ones. It represents the eternal drama of the relations of Man and Mother Nature, insatiable in her desire to give birth and to destroy... Following her, repeating her in his own way, man looks round anxiously and inevitably turns out to be just a fraction of a moment in her shade. He is capable of love, but she does not need it. He is bound to live in the awareness of his mortality, and she does not care. These relations are eternal, but each person experiences them anew: their outer shape changes, it depends on the particular time and space, and, of course, on the peculiarities of each particular Ego, but their essence and outcome are always the same.

The sub-title of the short story, “1664”, evokes the tradition of Dutch painting. The colours are golden, silvery, and ochre. Light is falling through the windows and is dimming in the far recesses of rooms. Yet suddenly in Theophilius’s hallucinations the same clothes and rooms are transformed – falling out from the actual time, and cold, monochrome colours dominate. As a dissonance to the beauty of arrested Time, characters and themes from antique mythology are used. Thus, the captain of the ship is pseudo-Charon, who in his own unusual way has shun from his duties. The presence of such ironic, grotesque inversions will help to interpret and perceive with greater clarity and insight the subsequent “harmonious” twist of events in Eden – in the castle of Borgraph.

The short story “1883” does not portray the relationship between Brilsky and Lilith (Leila) as a process. It is like paging through a family album. It consists of a series of enumerations in baroque style – it is evidence testifying to the enslavement and suffering of the young man who comes from Polish aristocracy. It is not merely a technical solution of the author. There can be no lasting relationship between the immortal Lilith and a common mortal. Brilsky’s mentor, Father Marziale, is torn by an invincible contradiction: on the one hand, his duties imposed on him by his social status (Brilsky appeals to him with the request of salvation), on the other hand, his self-righteous theological contemplation’s distracting the holy father from his spiritual mission. This becomes a grotesque, tragicomic culmination of the story.

The short story “1990” has the sub-title Cinéma vérité. The illusion of eclectic, as if randomly selected fractions of contemporary reality is to be created. The fact that the hero indulges in designing various installations “reconstructing” the world provides a favourable vantage point for artistic interpretation of today’s world and the love battle of the Installator and Lilith (the Gypsy Lola). The blinding unearthly charm of Lilith confronts the nature eternal as she herself, the nature of art. Lilith retreats – not everyone is destined to meet her.

The film is not a philosophical treatise, a syllogistic construction, it is a myth as well, not only inhabited by its characters, but also immersing, at least for a time, its audience. Having come to an end, each story does not become a false final of the film, but transfers its energy and information dynamically to the next one that traces new aspects of Lilith’s relationships with people. Nature at large is an essential element of the drama offered. The Wasp, as a character, “flies” through the structure of the whole film. Nature laughs grotesquely at Paul d’Ervi’s father’s “chickenly” consciousness (in the story “1883”). It is a mirror in which it is possible for a person to realise one of the few privileges left to them – to see their reflection, in which the eternal is experienced as the personal, and the personal as the eternal.

One can expect that this film could attract both wide audiences (thanks to the ‘love story – fairytale’ premise), as well as the sophisticated audience expecting from a film an aesthetic and intellectual challenge.

YEVGENY PASHKEVICH
screenwriter / film director / producer

Born November 1, 1948, Latvia, Daugavpils. Graduated from the All-Union Institute of Cinematography (VGIK), Film Director’s Department (R.L.Karmen workshop) in Moscow in 1978. Since 1969 worked at Riga Film Studio. In 2000 founded Nida Film Studio. Director of 2 fiction and 36 documentary films. Scriptwriter for 11 fiction and documentary films.

His films “The Long Day”, “Variations on the Theme” and “The Days of Man” were selected as study aid for the following film schools – VGIK (Russia), Graduate Film Programme at New York University and Harvard Film Archive at Harvard University (USA).

In 1992, the previous feature film by Yevgeny Pashkevich “The Days of a Man” (based on the novel by A. Bytov, screenwriter S. Soloviov, Riga Film Studio, 1989) was screened on the official programme of the Berlin International Film Festival (Panorama section) with considerable success. Since 1994, Vlad Petric, the curator of the Harvard Film Archives, has included “The Days of a Man” in his programme Oneiric cinema.
